FOREWORD

The following check-list records the early editions and contemporary reprints of political pamphlets relating to the American Revolution which are contained in The Newberry Library. The collection, at present numbering five hundred and seventy-four tracts, is about equally proportioned between American and British publications, so that considerable material is afforded for the study of the thoughts and purposes of both parties concerned in the Revolutionary controversy, and also for the study of the origins and development of American political institutions and ideals. In order to make this material known to students of American history, The Newberry Library issues this list in bibliographical form, in the hope that, despite limitations, it may be of service and value.

The pamphlets appearing in the main body of the list are all political, published during the period, 1750-1786. Reprints which appeared later of pamphlets originally printed during this period are not included. The following groups are included:

(1) The preliminaries, (1750-1763). Pamphlets, chiefly those discussing the political principles and political philosophy of the colonies.

(2) The Revolution, (1763-1783). Controversial pamphlets, both British and American.

(3) Revolutionary propaganda, (1775-1781). Sermons, orations and other materials, apparently printed to influence public opinion during the conflict.

(4) Political pamphlets, (1781-1786) reflecting on the progress and results of the Revolution.

(5) State papers, British and American, printed during the period, 1775-1786.

Pamphlets which relate to the conduct of the war and to the controversies of military commanders are omitted from the body of the list, but are mentioned in short title, in a final section, (p.96-101).

The description of each pamphlet is necessarily brief. Complete or almost complete titles and brief collation are given. In general, the collation follows the Library of Congress form with occasional expansion. Whenever possible, references are given to Sabin and Evans for further descriptions. For convenience, serial numbers are added, also Newberry Library call numbers (in brackets). In notes to controversial pamphlets cross references will be found whenever the collection contains both the original and replies. It has been the intention to follow the spelling and punctuation of the original title pages.

In view of the still existing uncertainty in the determination of authors of anonymous tracts, it has seemed advisable to add a title index which includes entries for all pamphlets listed under authors.

The following bibliographical authorities have been consulted:
